Dear Madam, Sir,

I am an avid hiker I have come to know the region's green belts quite well. I value them, and none more so than the one at Albrighton.

I understand the occasional need to reclassify land as the country needs new homes, but believe that the green belt at Albrighton should be the last one to be compromised. There are not many large but quintessential English villages left – and Albrighton is prominent amongst the ones that remain. Without its green belt, and with a large number of new houses, Albrighton would no longer be an attractive day trip for tourists and a hiking destination for people like me; and England would lose one of the remaining villages in which the historical significance is still immediately obvious.

With kind regards.
